So in the end, it comes down to population control. While I would agree with Kaplan that Lindau's socialism and the representation of the strike threaten to shatter both March's and Howells's strategies of containment, I agree with neither her assertion that the ending of the novel demonstrates the impossibility of reconciliation nor her argument that "Howells undercuts the strategy of framing narrative excess within the limits of moral commentary" While the greater sentimentality of the older edition certainly strengthens Kaplan's argument, the passages I am discussing appear in both editions and their differences therefore do not make a difference in my own argument.
